Industry Intel

Roofing contractors repair, replace and maintain roofs on residential, commercial and industrial buildings. Most roofers learn this trade with on-the-job training, and a formal apprenticeship training program can last up to three years. Roofing companies may also sell services such as insulation and siding and therefore present themselves as experts on maintaining the exterior materials of homes and buildings.

Roofing firms may also specialize in materials such as slate. When working with clients, roofers may have to bid on projects in order to win jobs. Contractors may also regularly apply to stay on pre-qualified contractor lists in order to be eligible to bid on projects.

Roofing contractors generally compete with each other. Small local companies may find that they need to create business partnerships with large home builders who enter the local market in order to be sure they are contacted when new housing projects are started.

The outlook for the industry is about even with general economic growth. Installation of roofs on new buildings is closely linked to the general housing and construction market. Key industry issues include the costs of liability insurance and materials, as well as the difficulty in finding local employees to take these positions, which has often led to the hiring of immigrant and sometimes illegal laborers. Immigration policies will have a major impact on this industry.

The U.S. has about 101,679 roofing companies. Revenue totals $76.4 billion.

Roofing contractors are experiencing strong demand, with 78% anticipating growth in 2026 and 89% expecting growth over the next three years.

SIDING CONTRACTORS

Siding contractors specialize in installing and repairing exterior cladding on homes and commercial buildings. They work with a variety of materials, including vinyl, fiber cement, metal, and engineered composites, providing services for new construction, renovations, and replacements. Demand is driven by homeowners and businesses seeking durability, aesthetic appeal, and protection against the elements.

Siding contractors serve both residential and commercial markets, with residential projects accounting for 57.9% of the market. Key material types include:

- Vinyl siding: The most popular choice, maintaining the largest market share.
- Fiber cement: A durable option gaining traction for its longevity.
- Engineered composites: A growing segment valued for weather resistance.
- Metal siding: Common in commercial buildings and specialty residential projects
- Wood and hybrid materials: Niche segments sought for their aesthetic appeal.

The U.S. siding wholesaling market is projected to reach $83.2 billion by 2026, growing at a 1.1% compound annual growth rate (CAGR). The broader U.S. siding market is expanding at a 2.5% CAGR, driven by growth in the construction sector. Investments in public and private infrastructure, along with domestic manufacturing expansions, are fueling demand for siding in both residential and commercial projects. Renovation and remodeling activity also supports steady market growth.

Residential siding demand is increasingly influenced by aesthetic considerations, as homeowners prefer visually appealing, low-maintenance materials. Weather resistance has become a priority, especially in regions with extreme climates. Energy-efficient and eco-friendly solutions are gaining traction in response to the rise of sustainable construction practices. Renovation and remodeling activity is particularly strong in developed markets with favorable mortgage rates, while new housing construction continues to accelerate due to urbanization. In 2026, demand is expected to focus on infrastructure and residential projects, benefiting siding contractors who combine durability with enhanced building appearance.

COMMERCIAL ROOFING

Commercial roofing sales remained strong in 2025, with 66% of contractors reporting growth over 2024. Looking ahead, 75% of contractors expect sales to increase in 2026, while 20% anticipate flat sales. Overall, 91% of contractors forecast continued growth through 2028. Single-ply roofing systems continue to dominate the market, used by 80% of contractors, followed by low-slope asphalt at 77% and metal roofing at 75%.

Among specific products, TPO is the leading category at 37% of respondents, followed by PVC at 28% and EPDM at 24%. Economic uncertainty remains a top concern, with 50% of contractors citing the economy and inflation as major business challenges. Labor shortages affect 36% of contractors, and labor costs increased for 57% of respondents in 2025. To retain talent, 77% of contractors report offering higher pay and bonuses, while 70% emphasize safe work environments and 66% ensure steady workloads.

Recruitment strategies increasingly rely on technology, with 68% using online job postings and 61% using employee referrals. Social media is also used by 55% of contractors. Technology adoption is rising, with 39% of contractors currently using artificial intelligence (AI) tools and another 27% planning to implement AI in the next two years.

Overall, the commercial roofing industry remains optimistic, with steady product demand, rising technology adoption, and strong projected sales growth through 2028.

Credibility - and whether a person has it or not - determines who you trust for guidance and information you use to make decisions in your everyday life. The four components of credibility for any human being are (1) being known, (2) being likable, (3) being helpful, and (4) being trustworthy. Credibility is gained (or lost) by what one says, how they say it, what they do and, finally, what others say about them. Having credibility also requires having others' best interests at heart.
