These businesses offer a variety of services ranging from once-a-year tax preparation to ongoing financial management advice as it relates to tax planning. These professionals usually have at least a four-year college degree in accounting or a related field. These firms serve a combination of consumer and business clients. When working for business clients, tax professionals might also offer additional services such as annual report preparation and payroll tax filing.

There are approximately 124,000 businesses offering tax prep services to U.S. taxpayers for a fee, and they generate annual revenues of approximately $13.9 billion.

In the consumer market, tax professionals compete with each other and with automated tax-preparation software.

Because most clients file their tax returns during the period from January through April of each year, substantially all revenues from income tax return preparation and related services and products are earned during this period. Early season filers typically file their tax returns shortly after their Form W-2s become available in order to receive their tax refunds as quickly as possible. Historically, most tax returns have been filed by the end of February.

Credibility - and whether a person has it or not - determines who you trust for guidance and information you use to make decisions in your everyday life. The four components of credibility for any human being are (1) being known, (2) being likable, (3) being helpful, and (4) being trustworthy. Credibility is gained (or lost) by what one says, how they say it, what they do and, finally, what others say about them. Having credibility also requires having others' best interests at heart.
