Industry Intel

Personal injury attorneys represent consumers who have experienced injury or wrongful death as a result of accidents, medical malpractice or other mishaps. They often work on a contingency basis which means they only earn money if they are successful in negotiating a settlement with the defendant or in winning a lawsuit. Most personal injury claims are settled before the case goes to the courtroom. Personal injury law is almost always considered civil law versus criminal law, which involves defendants who face jail time.

Personal injury law firms are usually structured as partnerships. Partners also hire less-expensive associates as well as office staff. Larger firms may hire high-level managers as well as in-house marketing staff. Note that this industry is highly fragmented because most personal injury cases involve a specific sub-segment of personal injury law that is very dependent on the laws of a specific region, city or municipality.

There are 50,435 personal injury law firms operating in the United States.

More than nine in 10 firms said word of mouth is an important marketing tool, but smaller firms are especially likely to prioritize referrals and reputation. 75% of firms market through their websites, while 60% use events, sponsorships or speaking engagements and 50% use social media content. Other digital and content marketing tactics, including SEO, social media advertising, search advertising, YouTube advertising, blogs, podcasts and email newsletters, were less common and showed little growth. Print advertising remained notable, with 46% of firms using it, particularly those with fewer than 50 lawyers.

58% of firms said word of mouth and client referrals accounted for more than half of their new business last year. [Source: "Law Firms Avoid Cuts, But ROI Remains a Problem." bestlawfirms.com, 24 Nov. 2025. Web. 31 Aug. 2026.]

Know the Customers

Target Customers

Consumers who have been victims of vehicle accidents, medical malpractice, premises issues, or product defects are clients of these businesses.

An industry survey found that more than 40% of firms primarily target corporate clients, while just over a quarter focus on consumers and about 20% serve both. Larger firms are far more likely to focus exclusively on business clients, while midsize firms are more likely to target niche industries or client segments.

Overall, firms average 611 active clients. By size, averages were as follows:

- Firms with 150+ lawyers: 5,319 clients on average
- Firms with 50-149 lawyers: 2,092 clients on average
- Firms with 20-49 lawyers: 1,356 clients on average
- Firms with 2-19 lawyers: 398 clients on average
- Solo firms: 98 clients on average

Top Factors People Consider When Choosing This Type Of Account

- Experience and track record: Nearly 40% of survey respondents said years of practice and success in similar cases matter most when choosing a personal injury attorney.
- Reputation and reviews: 27% of respondents said client testimonials, online ratings, and recommendations are key signals of professionalism and results.
- Fee structure and costs: Many clients prefer contingency arrangements, where attorneys are only paid if they win, and want clear information about percentages and fees.
- Communication and availability: Clients value attorneys who are responsive, explain the process clearly, provide updates, and are easy to reach.
- Honesty, ethics, and trust: Clients want transparent attorneys who avoid misleading claims and give them confidence throughout the legal process.

Credibility - and whether a person has it or not - determines who you trust for guidance and information you use to make decisions in your everyday life. The four components of credibility for any human being are (1) being known, (2) being likable, (3) being helpful, and (4) being trustworthy. Credibility is gained (or lost) by what one says, how they say it, what they do and, finally, what others say about them. Having credibility also requires having others' best interests at heart.
