Industry Intel

The U.S. market for attorneys specializing in wills, trusts, estates, and probate is estimated to be worth approximately $17.5–$18.0 billion annually in 2026, representing a niche but important segment of the roughly $400 billion U.S. legal services industry. Based on industry revenue models and the American Bar Association's count of approximately 1.32 million active lawyers, the specialty is estimated to include about 25,000–35,000 practicing attorneys who derive a substantial portion of their revenue from estate planning, probate administration, and trust work. Demand remains strong, driven by the aging U.S. population, the ongoing multi-trillion-dollar intergenerational wealth transfer, rising probate activity, and continued under-penetration of estate planning — more than half of U.S. adults still lack an estate plan, leaving significant room for market growth. Estate planning attorneys remain the most trusted source of estate planning advice, while AI and online legal platforms are increasingly augmenting, rather than replacing, attorney-led services for more complex matters.

Credibility - and whether a person has it or not - determines who you trust for guidance and information you use to make decisions in your everyday life. The four components of credibility for any human being are (1) being known, (2) being likable, (3) being helpful, and (4) being trustworthy. Credibility is gained (or lost) by what one says, how they say it, what they do and, finally, what others say about them. Having credibility also requires having others' best interests at heart.
