Industry Intel

Community banks are generally locally owned independent institutions, managing less than $10 billion in assets, though some manage assets worth billions of dollars. Historically, community banks have the interest of the local community as a priority and often invite local business leaders and prominent citizens to sit on the board of directors. These banks serve individual investors with savings and loans services but they also loan money to local businesses.

Though banking is an increasingly competitive business, newly chartered FDIC banks continue to open. To stay competitive, community banks are rolling out the convenience of online services while they try to maintain a personal touch with clients in local communities. Additionally, frustration with the "big banks" has led many customers to seek out local community banks.

There are approximately 3,909 institutions that are considered to be community banks. Total assets at the end of 2025 were $2.8 trillion while deposits totaled $2.3 trillion. Net income for 2025 was $295.6 billion, up 22.5%.

U.S. community banks have long been permitted to advertise to consumers. Updated FDIC regulations that took effect in 2024 modernized requirements for FDIC signage and advertising statements, including requirements addressing digital and mobile banking platforms. In addition to these tactics, some community banks host video contests to advertise. They invite certain local nonprofits to enter to win money for submitting videos regarding what their community means to them. T raises awareness about the nonprofits and the bank and can increase local support.

They also actively engage with their communities via partnerships, events and other supportive activities.

They position themselves as knowledgeable sources for consumers and businesses. Offering omnichannel resources, such as financial literacy programs and educational videos, can spread awareness and boost loyalty and credibility. Posting resources online also helps these businesses have a digital presence.

Loyalty programs will also evolve. They are expected to move away from entirely points based to more experiential rewards like retail and travel.

Credibility - and whether a person has it or not - determines who you trust for guidance and information you use to make decisions in your everyday life. The four components of credibility for any human being are (1) being known, (2) being likable, (3) being helpful, and (4) being trustworthy. Credibility is gained (or lost) by what one says, how they say it, what they do and, finally, what others say about them. Having credibility also requires having others' best interests at heart.
