Industry Intel

Convention and Visitors Bureaus (CVBs), also known as Destination Marketing Organizations (DMOs), aim to increase travel and tourism in their market areas. They often form partnerships with local travel and tourism service providers and target trade show business, meeting planners, and tour operators, as well as leisure and business travelers.

Some CVBs represent a single city, a metropolitan area, or a region of multiple cities and towns. They may operate as public, quasi-public, nonprofit, or private organizations and vary in structure depending on their location and funding.

Typical CVB/DMO subcategories include:

- Metropolitan CVBs: Promote large cities, often working closely with major convention centers, airports, and cultural institutions.
- Regional/State CVBs: Represent broader areas such as multi-county regions or entire states.
- Destination Marketing Organizations (DMOs): A broad term covering any entity that promotes tourism to a specific area; may overlap with CVBs.
- Themed or Special-Interest Bureaus: Focus on niche markets like sports, culinary, wine, or eco/adventure tourism.

Most DMOs are publicly funded through taxes, primarily from hotel stays, and operate as nonprofit organizations. They may also earn revenue from membership dues and advertising by local businesses. Some receive additional support from city, county, or state governments. Marketing teams often engage in co-op advertising with hotels or resorts and collaborate with local media.

DMOs typically consist of tourism professionals and stakeholders who support local businesses, residents, and visitors. Roles vary depending on the destination, and nonprofit DMOs report to government entities, funders, and the public.

In 2025, the U.S. CVB industry is expected to reach a market size of $3.3 billion, with approximately 5,126 CVBs nationwide. The sector has grown modestly, with a 0.5% compound annual growth rate (CAGR) from 2019 to 2024. However, the number of businesses increased at a 2.1% CAGR during the same period, indicating steady new entrants and industry stability.

The industry is not highly concentrated. The two largest organizations—The Las Vegas Convention and Visitors Authority (LVCVA) and Visit Florida—account for about 23.5% of total revenue. DMOs at this scale host major trade shows that can occupy up to 5,000 hotel rooms per night. Smaller CVBs still compete aggressively to attract events and visitors.

As consumer spending and corporate profits rise, individuals and companies are expected to allocate more of their budgets to travel, including vacations, meetings, and conferences. However, the industry remains sensitive to factors like natural disasters, health concerns, geopolitical instability, and security threats—all of which can impact travel demand.

Tourism tax revenue from visitor-related spending is projected to exceed $55.5 billion in 2025, up 2.8% year over year. Lodging taxes alone will surpass $26.8 billion, reflecting increased travel and strong hotel performance across states.

International arrivals, a key focus for state tourism offices, are expected to rise 6.5% in 2025 to 77.1 million visitors, reaching over 85 million by 2026 and 90.1 million by 2027.

Leisure and business travel continue to rebound, driving increased spending across lodging, transportation, attractions, and retail. Consumer surveys confirm strong demand for travel within and to the U.S., with many Americans planning longer trips and spending more per visit compared to previous years.

CO-OP ADVERTISING

These businesses are increasingly turning to co-op advertising, where organizations share resources to promote tourism. A co-op campaign is when travel industry partners, like airlines, hotels and attractions, join forces to pool their marketing budgets. By working together, they can reach more people, spend more efficiently and run bigger campaigns. This helps destinations get more exposure, support smaller businesses and strengthen relationships with partners.

Participation grew from 78% to 83% in just one year in 2024.
