Industry Intel

Resorts operate as part of the lodging and accommodations industry. In addition to offering rooms or suites and food service, resorts entertain guests with a variety of experiences designed to keep them on the premises. These activities range from sport activities to wellness and spas, as well as pools and on-site shopping. (casino resorts operate yet another industry segment).

Subcategories include:

- Luxury resorts - These properties have occupancy rates at 78%, driven by a 34% increase in high-net-worth traveler demand.
- All-inclusive resorts - Popular for families, groups and destination events, these facilities wrap dining, recreation, and lodging into one price.
- Wellness and spa resorts - A strong and growing subcategory targeting health, wellness and sustainable travel, contributing to a surge in wellness tourism.
- Destination resorts - Often centered around signature experiences (ski resorts, beach resorts, golf resorts), these attract guests for the full environment as much as lodging.
- Convention and conference resorts - Integrated meeting and event facilities cater to the business s 95% t for group stays, events, and conventions.
- Eco-resorts and sustainable properties - These prioritize green building certification, responsible sourcing and environmental stewardship for increasingly eco-conscious guests

A single resort's success can depend on its general location and the level of consumer interest in the types of amenities it offers. Some resorts may also sell time-share accommodations or full home ownership. Resorts market directly to consumers in the leisure travel segment but also compete for business conferences. Note that in the United States, luxury resorts drive much of the market's growth. The U.S. luxury hotel market (including resorts) is projected at $42.75 billion in 2025, rising to $62.22 billion by 2030—a compound annual growth rate (CAGR) of 7.8 percent

Independent companies must also compete with other lodging operators that are located near large tourist destinations. Beyond those details, resort owners must offer an attractive value proposition with great service and the specific qualities that would attract its target market. Resorts rely both on single-visit clients as well as returning clients.

Many large hotel chains are adding all-inclusive resorts to their offerings, which is creating even more competition. The U.S. resorts subcategory is poised for sustained growth through 2030. Occupancy and average daily rates remain robust, while investment continues to flow into high-touch service, technology, sustainability and unique experience design. Resorts are expected to keep capitalizing on demand from both luxury leisure travelers and B2B clients, maintaining resilience in the face of ongoing cost pressures and changing consumer expectations
